I. Situation or Experience

Stepping into this final year has thrown me right into a messy mix of schedule adjustments. Navigating an absurd schedule with late classes and constant timing clashes forced me to completely change how I pace myself. To make things harder, my laptop gave up on me, so I'm stuck using my phone and hitting up computer shops just to finish assignments. It's super exhausting, but I feel like these sacrifices will pay off. On the bright side, joining two organizations this final year has been a welcome addition—new faces, new tasks, and a fresh journey that should help my career. My academic performance is holding up steady like before, but I definitely want to push further since this is my last year.

II. Emotional & Cognitive Response

Honestly, a lot of days and nights have been super stressful and full of anxiety. I've caught myself feeling down, limited, and just incapable at times. Having so much on my plate with a broken laptop, tight deadlines, and limited resources makes it tough to put out the best quality work. It really shows how vulnerable I am when things pile up like this, and it's clear I need to work on handling that pressure better.

III. SEL Insight

This whole experience ties into self-management, relationship skills, and responsible decision-making. I've learned that I'm not actually alone in this, and it's completely okay to reach out and ask for help when things get heavy. Every day, I try to push past the frustration and face these hurdles with a smile—because you never really know what you can pull off unless you try. Between handling tech issues, daily stress, and getting ready for the upcoming capstone, I really want to practice better self-management and make smarter, responsible choices to get through my final year.
